Tunnel-Digging Rocket Claimed by Russians

CPYRGHT

By the Associated Press

The Russians claim they've developed a flame-spouting rocket which can dig tunnels. Such devices are to be used in the future to lay underground irrigation canals and pipes, they say.

The Central Intelligence Agency said yesterday a report to that effect appeared in a recent issue of a technical publication in Communist Hungary.

CIA told about it in a listing of unevaluated information extracted from recently received publications of the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe and China.

The abstract of the Russian report said:

"The first underground rocket has been prepared in the Soviet Union; it is being used to dig tunnels.

"The first part of the rocket has a pulverizing device which contains liquid fuel and compressed air. Powerful flames spout from openings in the pulverizer; these open a path for the rocket in a predetermined position. In this way, a cylinder-like tunnel develops behind the rocket. . . .

"The first experiments have been conducted with satisfactory results. In the future they (engineers) will use the device to lay underground irrigation canals and pipes."

Mr. Bagnall telephoned to say that the Bureau of the Budget apparently had a change of heart and had informed NSF that PL 480 funds for 1960 would be treated in the same manner as funds for 1959. NSF gets about [REDACTED] and CIA is in for [REDACTED]. As a possible announcement of CIA's interest in the program might interfere with translation work to be done in foreign countries, I agreed with Mr. Bagnall's recommendation that our [REDACTED] allocation be lumped with NSF's [REDACTED]. Just how we will maintain our rights to the [REDACTED] is not quite clear to me but I would think that a classified memorandum from Mr. Bagnall to NSF on this subject might give us a certain amount of assurance that we have a claim to it, particularly if we get a reply from NSF.
